HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Every aarti is set out the same way. The Marathi or Sanskrit line comes first, in dark type. Directly beneath it, in blue, is the same line written out in English letters and broken into syllables, so that anyone can sing along without reading Devanagari. The refrain — the line the whole room comes back to — sits in a tinted band so you can find it at a glance.

The English meanings are gathered at the back of the book rather than beside the verses, so that the singing pages stay uncluttered. Read the meaning once; after that you will not need it.

A NOTE ON THE TEXT

- The Marathi and Sanskrit here follow the standard published text, checked line by line against a photographed Aarti Sangrah edition.
- The blue line is a pronunciation aid, not a transliteration scheme. Families sing these differently from region to region, and every one of those ways is correct.
- The English meanings are written to convey the sense of the verse, not to translate it word for word.
- Verse numbers and the ॥६॥ mark for the refrain follow the traditional printing.

THE MEANINGS

श्री गणपतीची आरती

Ganpati Aarti

Ganpati is hailed as the maker of happiness and the remover of sorrow, the one who ends all word of obstacles. His devotees are shown his beloved form: vermilion paste over every limb, a necklace of pearls at his throat, a jewelled crown, sandal and saffron, anklets that chime as he moves. The closing verse is the plea the whole aarti builds toward - come to us in danger, protect us at the final hour.

श्री शंकराची आरती

Shankar Aarti

Shiva is seen in the same breath as terrifying and beautiful - garlanded with the whole cosmos, the poison dark at his throat, fire in his third eye, and the crescent set tenderly on his head, with the pure Ganga running down from it. The aarti moves through Parvati at his side, the scattering of sacred ash, and the churning of the ocean, when the Halahal poison rose and Shiva alone drank it and so became Nilkanth, the blue-throated one. Ramdas signs the last verse: this Lord is held in the devotee's own heart.

श्री देवीची आरती

Devi Aarti

The Mother is called by the name that means the un-crossable: Durga, without whom this world is too hard to cross. She is refuge for those who have none, and the devotee asks her plainly to end the round of birth and death and to lift the danger at hand. The middle verses confess that the four Vedas and the six schools of philosophy wore themselves out and still could not describe her, yet she comes at once to anyone who simply loves her. Narahari, the poet, ends lost at the dust of her lotus feet.

श्री दत्ताची आरती

Datta Aarti

Dattatreya is the three qualities in one form, the ruler of the three worlds, and finally beyond every description - neti, neti, not this, not this. He is outside and inside alike, one single Datta, though the unlucky mind cannot take the news in. The aarti then turns to what actually happens: Datta comes and stands before the devotee, who falls full-length in love, and receives the blessing that ends the wheel of birth and death. In the last verse the meditation has gone so deep that the difference between me and you has quietly been seen off.

घालीन लोटांगण

Ghalin Lotangan

This is the prayer that closes the aarti, and it climbs in four steps. Sant Namdev begins with the body: I will throw myself full-length before you, worship your feet, look my fill at your form, embrace you and wave the lamp. Then the Sanskrit takes over and widens: you alone are mother, father, brother, friend, learning and wealth - you are everything to me. Then whatever I do, with body, speech, mind or senses, I lay at Narayana's feet. It ends in pure names - Achyuta, Keshava, Krishna, Rama - and the Hare Rama Hare Krishna, where nothing is asked for at all.

मंत्रपुष्पांजली

Mantra Pushpanjali

Mantra Pushpanjali is the handful of flowers offered at the very end of worship, and it is Vedic rather than devotional in tone. The first verse says that the gods worshipped through sacrifice, and those were the first sacred laws - and by them the worshippers reached the heights where the ancient ones dwell. The second salutes Vaishnavana, Kubera, lord of abundance, asking that wishes worth wishing be granted. The third is the great blessing: sovereignty of every kind, extending over the whole earth to the sea, for a full span of life. The fourth remembers King Marutta, in whose house the Maruts themselves served and the Vishvedevas sat in assembly.

॥ सर्वे भवन्तु सुखिनः ॥

May these aartis bring peace to our homes,
strength to our hearts, and devotion to our lives.
